Any information shared will be held in the strictest confidence. The Rehabilitation of Offenders Act of 1974 addresses how to treat ex-offenders fairly and assist them in finding employment. You can find additional details on

<https://www.gov.uk/government/publications/new-guidance-on-the-rehabilitation-of-offenders-act-1974>

Despite the fact that your caution or conviction is regarded as spent under the 1974 Act, there are some circumstances in which you will still need to declare it. The vocations and pursuits that are specified in the Exceptions Order primarily have to do with extremely delicate fields, including working with children or in the health and social care industry. This is done in acknowledgement of the fact that there are some occupations for which a person's criminal past should be disclosed in greater detail. Examples include jobs where there is a genuine risk to children, other persons in vulnerable situations, or other particularly sensitive areas of work.

You should be aware that in these situations, the organization may also request the same information from the Disclosure and Barring Service in addition to asking you to reveal your cautions and convictions. ("DBS").

If you are hired for the position you applied for, you will need to submit to either a "enhanced" or "regular" criminal background check. You will be asked to approve this application after being informed of the sort of Certificate that is needed. Upon request, a copy of your DBS check will be provided. There is more information about <https://www.gov.uk/guidance/basic-dbs-checks-guidance>

Do you have any convictions or cautions with conditions?

This is true whether there have been any convictions or cautions in the UK or in any other nation where the offense would be regarded as a comparable (or similar) one in England and Wales.

As long as it would be regarded as an equal offense in England and Wales, it also includes criminal convictions or related service disciplinary convictions obtained through the Armed Forces Justice System (e.g., by Summary Hearing or Court Martial).

It excludes infractions related to parking. You can choose no in these situations.

If you respond in the affirmative to this question, your application will still be taken into consideration. Only information that is pertinent to the position you have applied for and where there may be related risks against the responsibilities you may be expected to fulfill in this function will be taken into account by employers.
